Infection rates of male and female rats exposed to murine norovirus. The disease course of spontaneously occurring murine norovirus (MNV) infection in a genetically susceptible rat strain was measured over a 32 day period in two independent experiments, at two different husbandry centres. Male and female rats from two different genetic strains (F344 and Fischer 344) were divided into two experimental groups and infected either orally or rectally with 10(4) plaque-forming units of mouse-adapted MNV-1 (CA8). Infection rates in experimental animals were significantly higher than in control animals in both strains of rats. Infection in male and female F344 rats showed similar rates in the two experiments (82 and 68% infection rates for the oral and the rectal route respectively), indicating that the strain was resistant to the infection. In Fischer 344 rats infection rates for the rectal route of infection were significantly higher in one of the two experiments than in F344 rats (100 and 43%), reflecting the strain's susceptibility to the infection. Although the large variation in experimental infection rates indicated that rat infection with MNV was difficult to predict, the average disease course of experimental animals was comparable to that of human cases. The relatively short duration of the experiment required further adaptation of the infection model. View other formats and editions Record details ISBN:9781438119705 (electronic bk.)
