Drugs designed to inhibit the enzymes of the RAS have been developed and tested. One class of these inhibitors (called angiotensin converting enzyme (ACE) inhibitors) have been extensively developed. Although the berogs of the RAS have been effective in lowering blood pressure and treating blood pressure and expensive than originally believed. For example, ACE inhibitors are effective in treating blood pressure and heart failure. However, they have been found to also cause coughing. In addition, the side effect of cough is exaggerated in patients with renal dysfunction. Therefore, ACE inhibitors are contraindicated for such patients. The drugs of the RAS have been found to cause electrolyte disturbances, resulting in disorders such as hyperkalemia, hyponatremia, and edema. Still further, the drugs of the RAS have been found to cause fluid retention, which, when excessive, could be life threatening. Finally, the ACE inhibitors have been found to be particularly useful for treating diabetic and other glomerulonephritis patients. However, when ACE inhibitors are prescribed to these patients, the resulting blood pressure is generally not as low as desired. One of the reasons for this phenomenon is that ACE inhibitors promote the growth of peptide AGE which in turn inhibits ACE. Ongoing efforts have been devoted to searching for novel compounds that are capable of inhibiting the RAS enzymes, while not having the above-described side effects.
