Robots Character-analyzers - The computer analyzes the player's skills, senses, statistics, weapons and does not treat its use and existence arbitrarily. The computer does not calculate the combat outcomes on its own, the computer performs a real fight, calculating all critical points. At the end of the battle, the computer gives the player a detailed report about a player's mistakes and achievements, about the strengths and weaknesses of the player's character, etc.

Adaptation to a player's skills - There are different campaign types: RPG, and various combat modes. A computer determines whether to attack the player's troops, or fight the opponents. The generalist and the archaeologist adventure types are slightly different. At the end of the game, the computer calculates the player's statistics, analyses the achieved results as an advantage or disadvantage of the game. All features allow the player to adapt to game circumstances and successfully pass through the journey.

Battle simulation - The computer performs real combat between the player's troops and the game opponents troops based on their skills and equipment. The computer gives the player a detailed summary of the fight and offers the most suitable weapons for the next fight, etc. The estimated probability of enemy troop attacks must not be taken into consideration when choosing the weapons. You must take only the most effective weapons.

Inventory list of items Throughout the game, gamers can learn special abilities and weapons. The computer calculates the attributes of the weapons. Then, in the next turn of the battle, the computer concludes that one of the listed weapons is best suited for the player. Obviously, the above method does not deal with all the abilities and items and cannot tell the gamer which weapon is best suited. The computer gives the player choices

First, the number of uninsured people in the country fell by 2.8 million in the last year, a sign that the Affordable Care Act is beginning to bite. And, a big new study published on Wednesday by the Commonwealth Fund finds that the health care costs for those with insurance continue to drop, particularly among lower income people. A lot of that is down to the Affordable Care Act, which has resulted in more people being covered under employer-provided insurance and Medicaid, which are collectively costing about $2,400 less per person, per year, than they were five years ago, according to the report. The uninsured part of the population is also getting cheaper care. Overall, the health care system is saving about $26 billion annually, according to the study, and is on track to save $108 billion by the end of 2016. To come to these conclusions, the Commonwealth Fund study relied on interviews with about 10,000 people in 10 states, including California, Florida, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Texas. It also looked at data on public and private health insurance policies, Medicare Advantage plans, and drug spending. Here's a breakdown of how the cost of the uninsured, Medicaid, and Medicare Advantage compare in each state:

State	Medicare Advantage	Medicaid	Uninsured
New York	22%	24%	17%
Texas	22%	21%	17%
Florida	Medic
