the averages are calculated using the sound power levels measured at the same time. the noise rating based on a single measurement is different from the average rating used to calculate the ratings that are shown on the meter. if the average exceeds the maximum noise rating, the maximum noise rating should be used to calculate the average. the maximum sound pressure level measured at any time during the period selected. the maximum noise exposure level for a 15-minute period is 115 dba. noise exposure above this level can result in hearing loss, which is the most commonly reported health effect associated with noise. the levels shown on the meter are simply the maximum sound pressure levels measured during the period. the actual noise exposure at any time during the period cannot be known, but the average of the maximum levels is used to calculate the maximum permissible exposure limits for the entire period. sound level meters are designed to measure the sound pressure level (spl) of sound. they are usually calibrated to a specific sound source, such as a car horn or a siren. the sound level meter is set to the appropriate sound source, and it is the sound level of the sound source, not of the sound itself, that is recorded by the meter. thus, the sound level recorded by the meter is always higher than the actual sound level of the sound source. if there are no sound level meters at a worksite, a two-step approach can be used. in the first step, the sound level of the noise can be determined by using a sound level meter as a reference. in the second step, a noise dosimeter can be used to determine the number of times the noise is above the established safe level.
